## The History of Royal Style

The history of royal style is long and varied. The earliest examples of royal fashion date back to the ancient Egyptians, who wore elaborate garments made from fine linen and adorned with gold and jewels. In the Middle Ages, European royalty adopted many of the fashion trends of the Byzantine Empire, which were characterized by rich fabrics, bright colors, and intricate embroidery.

The Renaissance saw a renewed interest in classical Greek and Roman fashion. Royalty began to wear garments that were more revealing and form-fitting, and they often incorporated classical motifs into their clothing. The Baroque period was a time of great extravagance in fashion, and royalty wore elaborate wigs, high heels, and heavily decorated clothing.

The 18th century saw a return to more sober and understated fashion. Royalty began to wear clothing that was more practical and comfortable, and they often adopted the latest trends from the middle class. In the 19th century, Queen Victoria popularized the use of white wedding dresses, and she also set the trend for wearing black mourning clothes.

The 20th century saw a number of changes in royal style. The rise of mass media meant that royalty was now being seen by a wider audience than ever before, and they began to adopt more modern and accessible fashion trends. In the 1960s, the younger generation of royals, such as Princess Margaret and Princess Anne, began to experiment with more daring and unconventional styles.

## HRH So Many Thoughts On Royal Style

The opinions on royal style are as varied as the people who hold them. Some people believe that royalty should only wear traditional clothing, while others believe that they should be free to express their own personal style. There is no right or wrong answer to this question, and it is ultimately up to each individual royal to decide what they wear.

However, there are some general consensus on what constitutes "good" royal style. It is generally accepted that royalty should dress in a way that is appropriate for the occasion and that they should avoid wearing anything too revealing or too casual. Royalty should also be mindful of their public image and how their clothing choices will be perceived by the public.
