In a twist of fate, Cheng found herself uprooted from her familiar surroundings and transplanted to Canada at the age of 13. This abrupt transition from a rural village to a bustling Western city plunged her into a world of cultural and linguistic barriers. The memoir vividly captures her struggles to adapt to a new language, customs, and social norms, while grappling with the weight of expectations from both her family and her newfound society.

The Search for Belonging

The journey of immigration is often fraught with feelings of isolation and displacement. Cheng's memoir explores these emotions with raw honesty, as she navigates the complexities of belonging in two distinct worlds. As a Chinese woman in Canada, she faced subtle and overt forms of discrimination, from the casual slurs of classmates to the unspoken barriers in the workplace.

Yet, within this challenging landscape, Cheng also found solace and support from unexpected sources. She formed deep connections with other Chinese immigrants who shared her experiences and offered a sense of community. Through her friendships and mentorship, she gradually discovered her own voice and began to forge a new sense of identity that embraced both her Chinese heritage and her Canadian present.
